B2B decision-makers: what drives their decisions and what holds them back

Analysis of 79 public conversations with Polish business owners and managers

KEY TAKEAWAYS

B2B decision-makers: what drives their decisions and what holds them back

1

Growth opens the conversation, trust closes it

Growth and scale come up in 86% of conversations, relationship and trust in 77%. Decision-makers buy from people, not product features.

2

Price is not the main barrier

Price and budget rank only sixth among barriers (28% of conversations).

3

Regulation and time hold them back most

Regulation and law come up in 48% of conversations, long decision processes in 44%.

4

The fear is about implementation, not the product

Implementation risk (40%) and a team lacking skills (39%) reflect a fear that the company won't cope with the change.

5

Events trigger decisions

Changes in law, falling revenue, an acquisition opportunity: decisions rarely happen "in a vacuum".

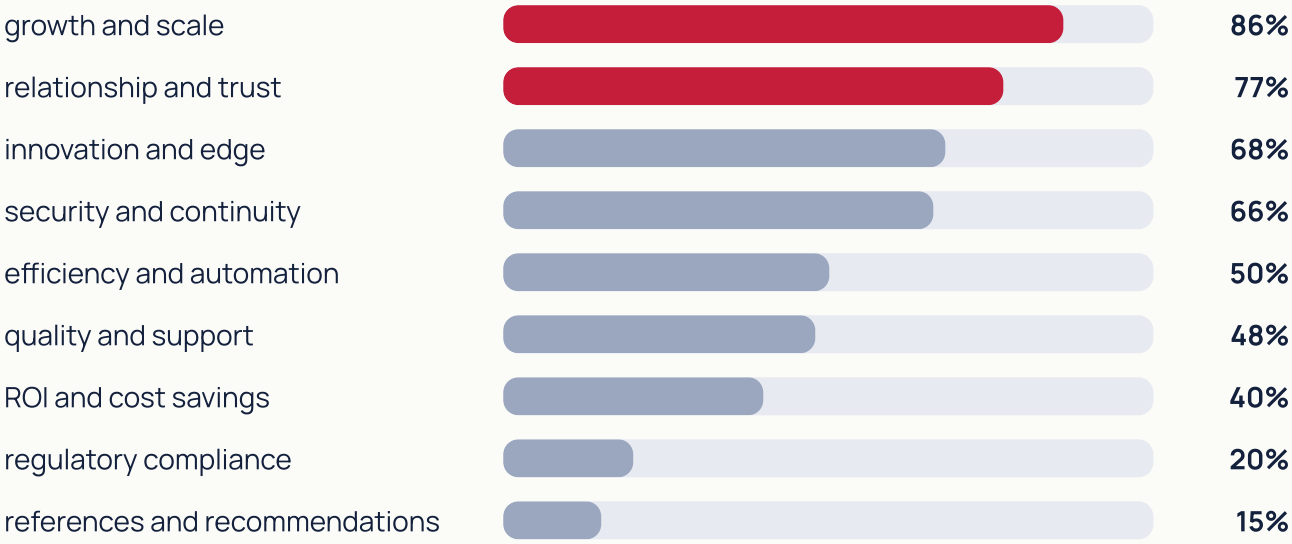

6

They talk plainly

Technical language accounts for only 9% of analysed statements. Most speak in a neutral or colloquial way.

MOTIVATIONS

What drives decision-makers to act

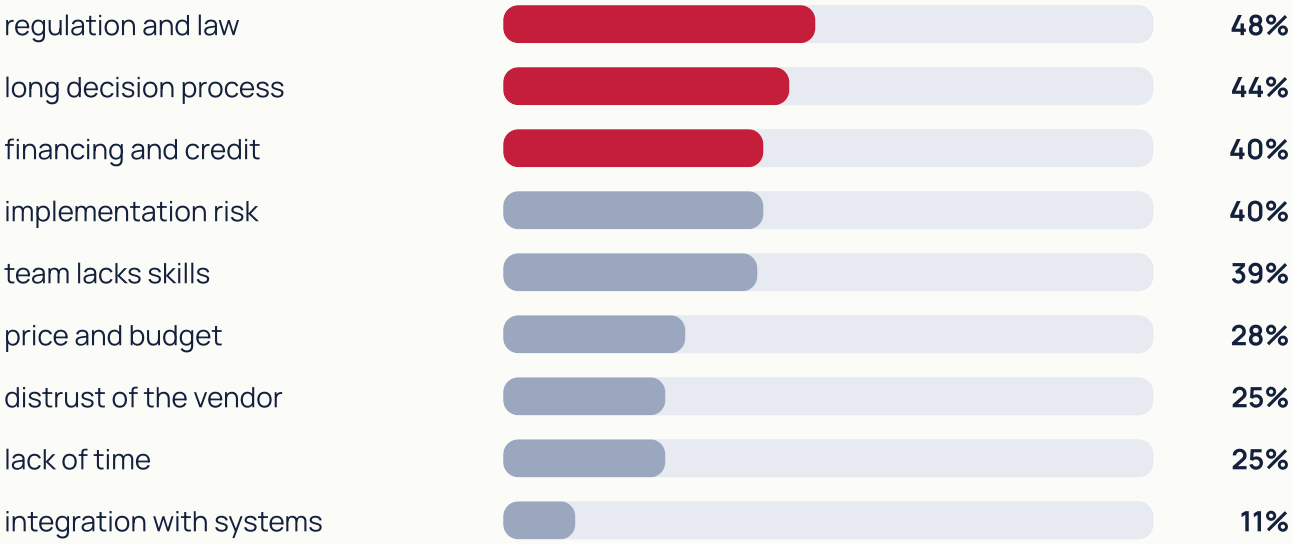

Source: analysis of 79 public conversations (YouTube, business podcasts), 2024–2026. Share of conversations in which a theme appeared.

Growth is the starting point, but relationship comes right after. Return on investment, often put first in B2B messaging, comes up far less often than trust.

BARRIERS

What holds decisions back

Source: analysis of 79 public conversations (YouTube, business podcasts), 2024–2026. Share of conversations in which a theme appeared.

The five most common barriers concern the environment and the organisation: law, time, financing, implementation and the team. Price comes later. “Cheaper” addresses a problem decision-makers think about less often than “safer” and “simpler”.

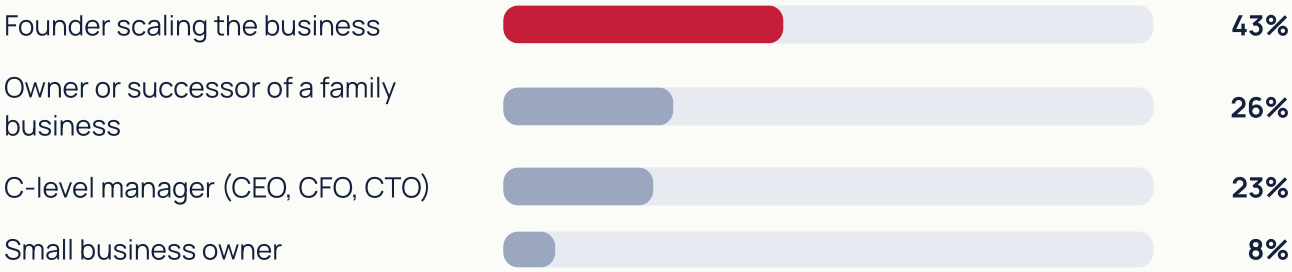

TRIGGERS AND TYPES

What triggers a decision

In the conversations, a purchase decision usually has a specific external reason:

- changes in law and regulation
- falling revenue or sales
- a growing market
- an investor's offer
- an acquisition opportunity
- market consolidation

Four types of decision-makers in the conversations

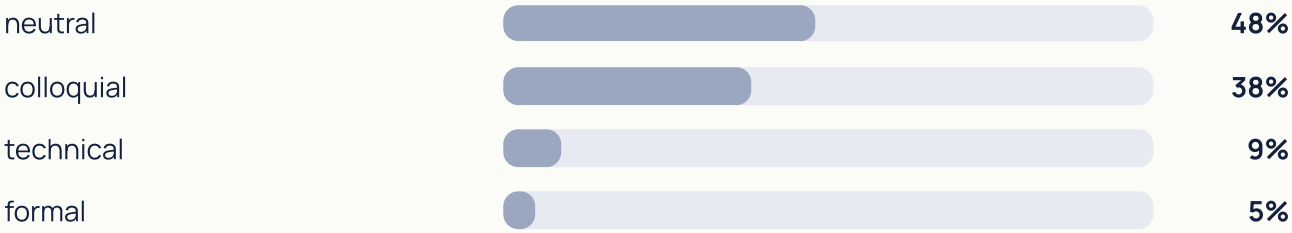

Share of types in the analysed conversations. Not the structure of the whole population of decision-makers.

LANGUAGE AND MEDIA

How decision-makers talk

Language register in 81 statements about purchases, finance, brands and media:

Takeaway: content written in industry jargon speaks a different language than its audience. Decision-makers describe their decisions simply and concretely.

How they use media

- they reach for longer formats: books, long articles, hours-long conversations and podcasts,
- some deliberately limit social media,
- many create content themselves: run channels, write, appear on podcasts,
- they trust experience and recommendations more than advertising.

Recurring themes in statements about media. Counts too small for percentages.

TAKEAWAYS

Six takeaways for brands and publishers

1

Start with growth, not features

The first screen should say how the product helps the company grow.

2

Show the people

Who stands behind the offer, who implements it, who picks up the phone. Trust is built through relationships.

3

Address regulation head-on

A short, separate section on compliance removes the most common barrier.

4

Describe the first 30 days

What implementation looks like, how much of the team's time it takes and who will help.

5

Ride the events

Changes in law, quarterly results, market consolidation: moments when decision-makers look for content.

6

Write plainly

Conversational language, not jargon. Long form, yes, but concrete.

ABOUT THE REPORT

Where the data comes from

The report is based on an analysis of 79 public conversations with Polish business owners, family business successors, founders and senior managers, published on YouTube and business podcasts in 2024–2026. Percentages show in what share of conversations a theme appeared. This is qualitative research: results describe the analysed conversations, not the whole population of decision-makers in Poland.

Limitations

- Public conversations more often feature companies that succeeded. The voice of companies that failed is missing.
- There is little content on the vendor selection process itself, and a lot on strategy and growth.
- The report does not quote specific people. It shows aggregated themes and paraphrases.
